CONNECTICUT FISHING REPORT

by Bob Sampson Jr.

through the schools of fish with light spinning or bait casting tackle spooled with six to ten-pound test Fireline and baited with half to one-ounce jig heads tipped with white four-inch Fin-S Fish, Zoom Flukes, or twister tails.

Then on the way back up river, a second light rod is used to drag (without any additional weight) a small (maximum 5-inch long) deep-diving Rapala or chrome-colored Bomber Deep A (in the 4.5-inch size). This light line trolling technique, though not as productive as the wire, is much more fun and a great deal less strain to fish.

Don't bother trolling or drifting through anything but large dense schools of fish, because most of the mid-to-late winter there's only a small percent of that five, ten or even twenty-foot thick mass of fish that will actually strike.

If temperatures remain mild, a second viable option for February along the coast is searun brown trout in the estuaries denoted in the "Connecticut Anglers Guide" as being "searun brown trout management streams". This list includes Whitford Brook (upper Mystic River), Latimer Brook (upper Niantic River), the Hammonasset and Saugatuck Rivers, along with a few others.

Searuns will strike any of the classic trout lures, even Rapalas and other small swimming lures, although the best method is to live-line live mummichogs or shiners on ultra-light tackle with tiny hooks.

A third option for freshwater anglers is the excess brood stock of Atlantic salmon that was stocked into the Naugatuck and Shetucket Rivers during the late fall. Fishing will be difficult if temps have become rock bottom cold, but still worth trying if they have remained mild since the writing of these words.
